HE Château Ramezay is one of the oldest and most characteristic of the French seigneurial mansions in Canada. Historically, it is the most interesting building on the Continent of America.

Claude de Ramezay, who built the Château in 1705, was a distinguished soldier of noble birth, and Military Governor of Montreal. From the Château for nearly a score of years he directed the closely connected military and commercial affairs of his post, and his generous hospitality made his home a resort for every sort of pioneer and adventurer.

When he died, his heirs, unable to support so extensive an establishment, sold the Château to La Compagnie des Indes.

Thus the home of a powerful family became the chief warehouse of a great trading company, an open market place through which for the next twenty years moved a picturesque procession of Indians, voyageurs and courreurs-de-bois, halting only to fling down loads of furs and barter with the clerks.

Then the day dawned when the heavy doors were closed and the bolts shot. Lord Amherst was knocking at the city gates; Messieurs de La Compagnie were packing up their traps. The old régime had passed away with all its glory and its woe.

Again the Château became private property, through purchase from the Company by William Grant, Baron de Longueuil. It is uncertain whether the Grants ever occupied the Château, for during about ten years it continued to be known as "The India House." Then the Government, wishing the Lieutenant-Governor of Montreal to be suitably housed, leased it and installed therein Mr. Cramahé.

Scarcely was he established, when, on a November morning in the year 1775, Montreal was peremptorily invited to receive unwelcome visitors in the persons of General Montgomery and a band of citizen soldiers just arrived from the revolting colonies to the South.

Mr. Cramahé, a gentleman apparently more discreet than valorous, incontinently fled. General Montgomery saw the Château, liked it, and at once made it his headquarters. During the brief American occupation of Montreal, two men of world-wide renown lived there, and wasted a good deal of their time in trying to detach the French Canadians from their new allegiance to the British Crown; one of these was Benedict Arnold—the traitor, Benedict Arnold; the other was the printer, scientist, diplomatist, philosopher, Benjamin Franklin.

After the defeat of Montgomery at Quebec, the visitors speedily flitted and the Château again waited silently for a tenant, until the Government bought it out and out from the Grants, and made it the official residence for Governors of Lower Canada temporarily resident in Montreal.

For half a century it was occupied by successive governors who made many alterations and additions, none of which may be correctly described as improvements. Lord Metcalfe was the last resident governor, but for some years after his establishment in a new government house the Château was used for departmental offices. When Montreal ceased to be the provincial capital, the Château served various purposes. For several years the courts sat there, and afterwards certain rooms were used for classes of the Normal School and of the Medical Faculty of Laval.

About twelve years ago its fortunes touched low water mark, for in the hall where the representatives of three great nations had sat in council, civic magistrates meted justice to the vulgarest offenders.

In 1893 the Château was sold at public auction by the Provincial Government, and bought by the Corporation of the City of Montreal, with the intention of preserving the building and establishing in it a free public archaeological, scientific and historical museum.

This happy result was brought about chiefly by the zeal and persistence of the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society, which in the year 1895 was given possession of the Château and permanently installed there as custodians for the people.
